New CIA Military Chief Seen Typical

Top figures in the Central Intelligence Agency appointed by President Kennedy seem to follow the pattern of previous officials of the CIA. An example is General Marshall S. Carter, named by Kennedy to serve as Deputy Director under Director John A. McCone.

It is unfortunate that the President should turn a deaf ear to Senators who because of his obvious eminent qualifications, wanted General Arthur Trudeau, formerly head of Military Intelligence, named instead of Carter. This, further, because, while Trudeau is highly qualified in military intelligence, Carter, according to Human Events has had no intelligence experience.

"Human Events" further relates that it consulted a certain retired General, formerly high in Intelligence, who is also known as an especially profane old warrior. When the general was asked whether Carter would make a good military chief of Central Intelligence, he replied;

"If he does, then I'd make a good Chief of Chaplains." He added that Carter is "simply a henchman of General George C. Marshall and that this brings the military chief of CIA into line with the Marshall-Acheon, Truman crowd which lost China to the Communists."

"Human Events" says that "military opinion seems to be that the replacement of the Allen Dulles team by McCone et al, offers no hope for improvement over what was regarded as a disastrous operation."

And that one of the key civilian figures often blamed for Allen Dulles' boo-boos, is Robert Amory and he—it is indicated—remains. He is a well known liberal."
